

"Overlong but fascinating" -- New York Times

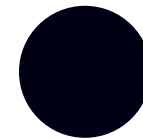

You will never again fail to notice the sleek, clean, ubiquitous sans serif typeface developed in 1957 by Swiss graphic designer Max Miedinger that is loved and hated to equal degrees by designers and typographers.

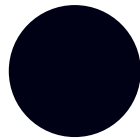

Opens our eyes to the visual culture of typography in much the same way as Andy Warhol once freed us from the tyranny of advertising, by inviting reflection upon that which is intended as a subliminal encounter.

A typographic documentary by Gary Hustwit

Helvetica

With the stylish simplicity of its namesake, Helvetica keenly distills the eternal aesthetic battle between the classical and the baroque and explores what happens when a revolution goes mainstream.
